

The architects built as many micro-houses as possible on a narrow and deep site. By dividing volumes three-dimensionally, they tried to find hidden spaces which are invisible in the two-dimensional plane. Through this process, they designed small, yet comfortable one-bedroom units.